DON'T BE A STEALTH APPLICANT: LET COLLEGES KNOW YOU ARE INTERESTED

Students are often called "stealth applicants" because they read about and research college online, without making themselves known to the colleges. When an application arrives from a student who has had no other contact with the college, their level of interest in the college is a question mark. Don't get misjudged as a "trophy hunter" - a student who applies to a long list just to see how many colleges they can have on their admitted list. If you are truly interested, be sure and let the college admissions staff know about it.

Visit the college website, go to the admission page and click on the link for "meet the admission staff" or "meet us in your area" to find out who will be reading your application. This is a great contact for you to use to ask questions or find additional resources for your search. You can also save time and money by finding out if an admission counselor will be in your home area for information sessions and interviews.

Visit CTCL (Colleges That Change Lives) for more information about the college search process (http://www.ctcl.org/news/college-search)
